

CRS Report for Congress

NATO Enlargement: Albania, Croatia, and Possible Future Candidates

October 6, 2008

Vincent Morelli, Coordinator,
Paul Belkin, Carl Ek, Jim Nichol, and Steven Woehrel
Foreign Affairs, Defense, and Trade Division

Prepared for Members and Committees of Congress

Report Documentation Page				Form Approved OMB No. 0704-0188
Public reporting burden for the collection of information is estimated to average 1 hour per response, including the time for reviewing instructions, searching existing data sources, gathering and maintaining the data needed, and completing and reviewing the collection of information. Send comments regarding this burden estimate or any other aspect of this collection of information, including suggestions for reducing this burden, to Washington Headquarters Services, Directorate for Information Operations and Reports, 1215 Jefferson Davis Highway, Suite 1204, Arlington VA 22202-4302. Respondents should be aware that notwithstanding any other provision of law, no person shall be subject to a penalty for failing to comply with a collection of information if it does not display a currently valid OMB control number.
1. REPORT DATE 06 OCT 2008		2. REPORT TYPE		3. DATES COVERED 00-00-2008 to 00-00-2008
4. TITLE AND SUBTITLE NATO Enlargement: Albania, Croatia, and Possible Future Candidates				5a. CONTRACT NUMBER
				5b. GRANT NUMBER
				5c. PROGRAM ELEMENT NUMBER
6. AUTHOR(S)				5d. PROJECT NUMBER
				5e. TASK NUMBER
				5f. WORK UNIT NUMBER
7. PERFORMING ORGANIZATION NAME(S) AND ADDRESS(ES) Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, 101 Independence Ave, SE, Washington, DC, 20540-7500				8. PERFORMING ORGANIZATION REPORT NUMBER
9. SPONSORING/MONITORING AGENCY NAME(S) AND ADDRESS(ES)				10. SPONSOR/MONITOR'S ACRONYM(S)
				11. SPONSOR/MONITOR'S REPORT NUMBER(S)
12. DISTRIBUTION/AVAILABILITY STATEMENT Approved for public release; distribution unlimited
13. SUPPLEMENTARY NOTES
14. ABSTRACT
15. SUBJECT TERMS
16. SECURITY CLASSIFICATION OF:			17. LIMITATION OF ABSTRACT Same as Report (SAR)	18. NUMBER OF PAGES 37	19a. NAME OF RESPONSIBLE PERSON
a. REPORT unclassified	b. ABSTRACT unclassified	c. THIS PAGE unclassified

NATO Enlargement: Albania, Croatia, and Possible Future Candidates

Summary

At the April 2-4, 2008, NATO summit in Bucharest, Romania, a principal issue was consideration of the candidacies for membership of Albania, Croatia, and Macedonia. The allies agreed to extend invitations to Albania and Croatia. Although the alliance determined that Macedonia met the qualifications for NATO membership, Greece blocked the invitation due to an enduring dispute over Macedonia's name. After formal accession talks, on July 9, 2008, the foreign ministers of Albania and Croatia and the permanent representatives of the current 26 NATO allies signed accession protocols amending the North Atlantic Treaty to permit Albania and Croatia's membership in NATO. To take effect, the protocols must now be ratified, first by current NATO members, then by Albania and Croatia. Albania and Croatia are small states with correspondingly small militaries, and their inclusion in NATO cannot be considered militarily strategic. However, it is possible that their membership could play a political role in stabilizing southeastern Europe.

Another issue debated at the Bucharest summit was NATO's future enlargement and the question of offering Membership Action Plans (MAP) to Georgia and Ukraine. The MAP is generally viewed by allies and aspiring alliance members as a way station to membership. However, it is not an invitation to join NATO, and it does not formally guarantee future membership. The Bush Administration supports granting MAPs to Georgia and Ukraine. Both the Senate and House passed resolutions in the 110th Congress urging NATO to enter into MAPs with Georgia and Ukraine (S.Res. 439 and H.Res. 997, respectively). Despite strong U.S. support, the allies decided after much debate not to offer MAPs to Georgia and Ukraine at Bucharest. Opponents cited internal separatist conflicts in Georgia, public opposition to membership in Ukraine, and Russia's strong objection to the two countries' eventual membership as factors influencing their opposition. The allies pledged that Georgia and Ukraine would eventually become NATO members but did not specify when this might happen. They also agreed to review the MAP issue at the NATO foreign ministers ministerial in December 2008. The August 2008 conflict between Georgia and Russia has placed the membership prospects of Georgia and Ukraine and the future of NATO-Russia relations at the forefront of NATO discussions.

Congress has passed legislation over the past 15 years, including in the 110th Congress, indicating its support for NATO enlargement, as long as candidate states meet qualifications for alliance membership. On April 9, 2007, President Bush signed into law the NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007 (P.L. 110-17), expressing support for further NATO enlargement. On September 10, 2008, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a hearing on the accession of Albania and Croatia as a prelude to Senate ratification. For states to be admitted, the Senate must pass a resolution of ratification by a two-thirds majority to amend NATO's founding treaty and commit the United States to defend new geographic space. The potential cost of enlargement was a factor in the debate over NATO enlargement in the mid- and late-1990s. However, the costs of the current round are expected to be minimal. This report will be updated as needed. See also CRS Report RL31915, NATO Enlargement: Senate Advice and Consent, by Michael John Garcia.

Contents

Introduction	1
Process	2
The Candidate States	5
Albania	5
Domestic Reforms	5
Public Support for NATO Membership	6
Defense Reforms and Ability to Contribute to Allied Missions	6
Regional Issues	8
Croatia	9
Domestic Reforms	9
Public Support for NATO Membership	10
Defense Reform and Ability to Contribute to Allied Missions	10
Regional Issues	11
Macedonia	12
Domestic Political Issues	12
Defense Reform and Capacity to Contribute to Allied Missions	13
Name Dispute	14
Outcome	15
Enlargement Costs	15
U.S. Policy	16
Future Candidates for Future Rounds?	18
Georgia	18
Ukraine	20
Ukrainian Public Opinion and NATO Membership	21
Lack of Unity Within NATO on a MAP for Ukraine	22
Outcomes, Prospects, and Russia's Reaction	22
Russia's Reaction	24
Other Countries	26
Policy Considerations	27
Conclusion	29
Appendix. Legislation on Enlargement in the 109 th and 110 th Congresses	31

List of Figures

Figure 1. Europe	34
------------------------	----

NATO Enlargement: Albania, Croatia, and Possible Future Candidates

Introduction¹

On April 2-4, 2008, NATO held a summit in Bucharest, Romania. A principal issue was consideration of the candidacies for membership of Albania, Croatia, and the Former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia (FYROM).² The allies issued invitations to join the alliance to Albania and Croatia. Greece blocked an invitation to Macedonia because of a dispute over Macedonia's name. The invitations initiate the third round of enlargement in the post-Cold War era. In 1997, NATO invited Poland, the Czech Republic, and Hungary to join the alliance; they were admitted in 1999. In 2002, the allies invited Bulgaria, Romania, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Slovenia, and Slovakia to join the alliance; they were admitted in 2004. These last two rounds of enlargement were "strategic" in the sense that the new members' territory lay in regions that Russia once deemed critical to its own national interest, and in the sense that the region had been intensely involved in conflict for much of modern European history. In addition, several of these countries are sizeable, with considerable armed forces and significant resources.

Albania and Croatia are small countries, with correspondingly small militaries. Croatia was part of the former Yugoslavia, a communist state that kept the Soviet Union at arms' length and had reasonably friendly relations with the west. Albania, also once a communist state during the Cold War, was for many years the most isolated country in Europe. With the collapse of Yugoslavia and the end of the Cold War, the countries put themselves on the path to democracy and made commitments to join western institutions. The two countries have aspirations to join the European Union as well as NATO. Albania and Croatia, in the sense of their military importance and their general resources, would not represent a "strategic" presence in the alliance, although their consistent contributions to NATO operations have been lauded. However, due to the continuing instability in the region, further stirred by Serbia's and Russia's sharply negative reaction to Kosovo's independence, the two countries are a potential factor for stabilization in southeastern Europe.

Today, NATO's purpose extends well beyond the mission of collective defense of the Cold War era. Although collective defense remains a core function, the allies

¹ This report was originally conceived and coordinated by former CRS analyst Paul Gallis. This and the following section were prepared by Paul Belkin, Analyst in European Affairs, and Vince Morelli, Section Research Manager, Europe and the Americas Section.

² The country's name is in dispute. It will henceforth be referred to as "Macedonia" for the sake of simplicity only. The United States government recognizes the country by its official name, the "Republic of Macedonia."

now undertake missions against terrorism and proliferation of weapons of mass destruction. A global military reach is necessary for such missions. The Bush Administration has pressed the allies to develop more mobile forces, ones able to deploy over long distances and sustain themselves. Some of the member states, such as Albania and Croatia are expected to develop “niche” capabilities, such as special forces or troops able to contain a chemical weapons attack. NATO has also developed a collective security mission, such as its stabilization and peacekeeping operation in Kosovo.

Several allied governments believe that the overall pace of NATO enlargement is too compressed and wish to consider first how to resolve a complex range of issues. These governments tend to argue that other issues — the calming of nationalist emotions in Serbia, an overall improvement in NATO-Russian relations, and coming to grips with the wide-ranging problems in energy security — must first be resolved before considering new countries for membership.³

Process

The Washington Treaty of 1949, NATO’s founding instrument, does not describe detailed qualifications for membership. It does require that member states be democracies and follow the rule of law. It also requires that they take steps to strengthen their militaries and refrain from the use of force in settling disputes outside the treaty framework. Article X of the Treaty leaves the door open to any states able to meet the general qualifications for membership, including a contribution to the security of member states. The process by which governments interested in membership may join has been refined since the end of the Cold War. In 1994 NATO established the Partnership for Peace (PfP), a program in which non-member states might train with NATO forces, participate in peacekeeping or other allied activities, and seek avenues to draw closer to the alliance. Some countries, such as Austria, participate in the PfP program but are not necessarily interested in membership.

In 1995 NATO published a Study on NATO Enlargement.⁴ The report remains the most detailed public roadmap for governments wishing to enter NATO. It describes the need for candidate states to develop democratic structures and a market economy, respect human rights and the rights of ethnic minorities, and build a military capable of contributing to collective defense. In the 1995 study, NATO included other requirements, principally the need to settle all disputes, such as border demarcations, with neighboring countries. The Balkan conflicts of the 1990s gave this requirement special significance. With the collapse of the Soviet Union, NATO has also become a collective security as well as a collective defense organization. Prospective members must develop military forces trained for peacekeeping and state-building, as well as for collective defense.

³ Interviews with European officials, January-February 2008.

⁴ NATO, Study on NATO Enlargement, Brussels, September 1995. Available at [<http://www.nato.int/docu/basic/txt/enl-9501.htm>].

After the admission of Poland, the Czech Republic and Hungary in 1999, the allies, led by the United States, developed a more detailed process for prospective members. This process, called the Membership Action Plan (MAP), lays out in considerable detail specific steps that a government must follow to become a member. Such steps might include laws designating its parliament as having civilian oversight of the military, or the downsizing and professionalization of a large military, or the settlement of a border dispute with a neighbor. Each country's MAP is classified, as is its evaluation by the allies. During the 2003-2004 round of enlargement, the MAP was made available to the United States Senate for review.

Some allies have criticized the MAP process. They contend that it is primarily a creation of the United States and that the ultimate decision on whether MAP requirements are met is made principally in Washington. They say, for example, that the full range of qualifications outlined in the MAP in the 2003 round of enlargement was not adequately assessed for several states that became members of the alliance. They contend, therefore, that designation of candidate states as prospective members is above all a political process and that actual accomplishment of requirements is secondary to the will of the alliance's leader. U.S. officials dispute this characterization.⁵

For a candidate state to have been invited to join the alliance at Bucharest, consensus among the 26 member governments was necessary to approve an invitation. Each candidate was considered separately. One or more votes against a state would have blocked that state's progress to the next stage in the process of becoming a member. It was Greece's opposition to Macedonia that resulted in Skopje's failure to obtain an invitation. In March 2008, Greek Prime Minister Karamanlis said, "No solution — no invitation."⁶ There were other issues under discussion as well. According to some officials in allied states, Albania and Macedonia continue to have problems of governance and issues detrimental to internal political comity. At the same time, the two governments have evidently made considerable progress in military reform, and their populations overwhelmingly support NATO membership. Croatia has a settled political environment. A somewhat narrow majority of its population supports NATO membership; support has been rising in recent months.⁷ These issues are more fully discussed below.

The member states had hoped to make a preliminary determination about invitations at a NATO foreign ministers' meeting on March 6, 2008, but resolution of the issue surrounding Macedonia's name, and other issues, prevented a collective decision. At least two governments, France and Germany, expressed reservations about offering the MAP to Georgia and Ukraine. At Bucharest, other governments such as Spain and Italy shared the French and German view.⁸

⁵ Interviews with officials from allied governments, 2003-2008.

⁶ Statement of Prime Minister Karamanlis, Athens, March 2, 2008.

⁷ Interviews with officials from allied states, February-March 2008. A March 2008 poll showed that 59.3% of the population supports NATO membership. The figure had been below 50% until late 2007. "Latest Poll Shows Nearly 60% of Croats Support NATO Membership," BBC Monitoring European service, March 10, 2008.

After issuing official invitations to Albania and Croatia at the Bucharest summit, on July 9, 2008, the allies signed accession protocols for their entry into NATO. The protocols outline NATO's expectations of the two prospective members. The protocols have been deposited with each allied government. Member governments will go through their constitutional processes to amend the Washington Treaty and admit a new state or states.

In some member states, such as the United Kingdom, the government has the authority to determine whether the executive alone may decide to admit a state nominated for entry, or instead, if issues of broad significance are involved, may send the protocol to parliament for approval. At the other end of the spectrum, the Netherlands has a meticulous, time-consuming process involving a parliamentary study and debate before a final vote is taken. NATO hopes to admit prospective candidate states at its 60th anniversary summit, to be held on the French-German border, scheduled for April 2009.⁹

The United States Senate has the constitutional authority to give its advice and consent by a two-thirds majority to the amendment of any treaty. In the case of NATO enlargement, it must decide whether to amend the Washington Treaty to commit the United States to defend additional geographic territory. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is the committee that holds the initial authority to consider the issue.¹⁰ Both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the full Senate may decide whether to vote on each candidate state separately or all together. During the previous two rounds of enlargement, House and Senate committees held hearings on enlargement. One purpose of the hearings is to create more widespread knowledge of possibly pending new obligations of the United States government. In the past, committees have also discussed such issues as the costs of enlargement, the qualifications of the candidate states, regional security implications of enlargement, implications for relations with Russia, and new issues in NATO's future, such as the viability of new missions.

On September 10, 2008, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee held a hearing on the accession of Albania and Croatia to NATO. In his opening remarks, Senator Dodd, acting Chairman of the Committee, congratulated both candidates for the progress they had made in attempting to secure NATO membership and stated that both Albania and Croatia would be a force for stability in the Balkans. He reminded the committee that "to undertake a commitment to mutual defense is one of the more serious steps any government can take. Therefore we must consider ... the nature of the allies we are embracing.”¹¹ Senator Dodd was particularly interested in whether both candidates had achieved acceptable levels of reform in the areas of democratic election, rule of law, treatment of minorities, economic development, civilian control of the military, and the resolution of all territorial disputes with their neighbors. Appearing before the Committee, Daniel Fried, Assistant Secretary of State for European and Eurasian Affairs, stated that both Albania and Croatia had made “enormous steps forward in becoming stable democracies and instituting significant reforms” in many of the areas highlighted by Senator Dodd.¹²

⁸ "L'OTAN tempère les espoirs d'adhésion de la Géorgie et de l'Ukraine," Le Monde, March 7, 2008; interviews of European officials, February 2008.

⁹ Remarks by NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Schefer at the Protocol signing ceremony, July 9, 2008.

¹⁰ For a detailed discussion of Senate action during all the past rounds of enlargement, see CRS Report RL31915, NATO Enlargement: Senate Advice and Consent, by Michael John Garcia.

The Candidate States

Albania¹³

Albania was one of the first countries in central and eastern Europe to seek NATO membership after the fall of communism in the region in 1989-1991. Albania’s membership candidacy has been evaluated by the allies using a number of criteria, such as the state of its political and economic reforms, public support for NATO membership, defense reforms and ability to contribute to allied missions, and Albania’s role in its region. However, NATO’s decision on Albania’s candidacy was in the end a political judgment of NATO member states on whether Albania’s membership would contribute to their security.

Domestic Reforms. Most observers believe that the main challenges to Albania’s candidacy are questions about the pace of its political reforms. Albania’s current government is led by the center-right Democratic Party of Albania (DPA), which formed a coalition with several smaller parties after the country’s 2005 parliamentary elections. The government is led by longtime DPA leader and Prime Minister Sali Berisha. In the past, Berisha has often been criticized for having a harsh and uncompromising leadership style, although observers have noted that he has tried to moderate this image since the 2005 elections.

Albania at a Glance

Population: 3.6 million (2007 est.)

Ethnic Composition: 95% Albanian, 3% Greek, 2% others (1989 est.)

Total Area: 28,748 sq. km. (slightly smaller than Maryland)

Gross Domestic Product: $11.2 billion (2007 est.)

Defense Budget: $208 million (2007)

Active Duty Armed Forces: 11,020

Sources: 2008 CIA World Factbook; Military Balance 2008; Forecast International

¹¹ Opening statement of Senator Dodd, Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearing “Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty,” September 10, 2008.

¹² Testimony of Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, “Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty,” September 10, 2008.

¹³ Prepared by Steven Woehrel, Specialist in European Affairs.

Since its first multiparty election in 1991, Albanian politics have been marked by fierce political conflict between parties and factional struggles within them. In Berisha's previous tenure as Prime Minister, public order collapsed completely for several months in 1997 after the failure of financial pyramid schemes. Since 1991, both the DPA and the other chief Albanian party, the Socialist Party of Albania, have lost elections and refused to concede defeat, charging fraud. Indeed, the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE) has often assessed the quality of Albanian elections as not fully meeting international standards, including an OSCE report after the 2005 vote. Local elections in February 2007 also fell short of international standards, according to the OSCE, although Albania's record has gradually improved. U.S. and EU leaders have often called on Albania's leaders to show greater civility in their political struggles and to work together to prepare the country for Euro-Atlantic integration.¹⁴

Aside from the issue of political civility, Albania has significant legal and institutional shortcomings. Two key issues cited by U.S., NATO, and Albanian leaders themselves are electoral reform and judicial reform.¹⁵ The Albanian parliament is drafting new legislation on these issues, but progress has been slow. Moreover, observers note that passing laws is one thing; implementing them effectively is another.

Other Albanian reform efforts have focused on fighting organized crime and corruption, perhaps among the most serious challenges the country faces. Some of Europe's most powerful crime organizations are based in or have strong links to Albania.¹⁶ In Transparency International's 2007 Corruption Perceptions Index, Albania ranked 105th out of 175 countries, with the worst showing in central Europe. U.S. officials stress that anti-corruption policies must be followed up with effective investigations and prosecutions. They say Albania should make more progress in strengthening the independence of its prosecutors and judiciary.¹⁷

Public Support for NATO Membership. Public support in Albania for the country's membership in NATO is very high, with public opinion polls showing as many as 96% of those polled in favor. All major Albanian political parties across the political spectrum favor NATO membership.

Defense Reforms and Ability to Contribute to Allied Missions. Albania has made significant progress in military reforms. However, the country's small size and poverty will likely prevent it from making a large contribution to the alliance's military capabilities. With the assistance of the United States and other NATO countries, Albania is trying to develop a small, efficient, well-trained force that can operate effectively with NATO. The current strength of Albania's armed ¹⁴ Economist Intelligence Unit, Country Report: Albania, December 2007.

¹⁵ "Further Reform Necessary in Albania, Says NATO Secretary General," October 19, 2007, from the NATO website, [<http://www.nato.int>].

¹⁶ Jane's Sentinel Security Assessment: The Balkans, January 31, 2008.

¹⁷ Testimony of Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 10, 2008, op cit.

forces is 11,020 troops. By the time the country's restructuring effort is over in 2010, it will comprise about 10,000 men. Albania is devoting a significant share of its meager resources to defense spending. Albania's 2007 defense budget was $208 million, representing about 1.8% of the country's Gross Domestic Product (GDP). In 2008, Albania will spend 2.01% of GDP on defense, just above the 2% recommended by NATO for member states, although achieved by only seven of the 26 allies.¹⁸

As in the case of the previous round of enlargement, NATO has encouraged candidate states to develop "niche" capabilities to assist NATO missions. Albania has focused on creating a Rapid Reaction Brigade, military police, special operations forces, explosive ordnance disposal teams, engineers, and medical support units. Albania says it plans to have 40% of its land forces ready for international missions. Eight percent of the total forces would be deployable at any one time, and the remaining would be available for rotations, according to Albanian officials.¹⁹ Independent assessments of Albania's reform progress note that the country is committed to carrying out these reforms, despite facing severe practical and financial limitations.²⁰

Albanian leaders contend that their country has already acted for years as a de facto NATO ally. Albanian forces participated in SFOR, the NATO-led peacekeeping force in Bosnia, and are part of the current EU force there. Albania has deployed a company-sized force of about 140 men as part of ISAF, the NATO-led stabilization force in Afghanistan. It has deployed a military medical team to ISAF jointly with Macedonia and Croatia. Currently 240 Albanian troops are serving as part of the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq.

Albanian defense officials concede that Albania will continue to need bilateral assistance for some time to be able to participate in international missions. Much of its hardware comes as a result of international donations, and it lacks sufficient logistical capabilities, which require the assistance of allied countries when Albania's forces are deployed abroad.²¹

On March 15, 2008, a massive blast at an Albanian army ammunition dump at Gerdec killed 26 persons, injured over 300 others, and destroyed more than 400 homes. The incident took place during efforts to dispose of the country's huge stockpile of communist-era artillery shells, with the help of a U.S. contractor. Albanian Defense Minister Fatmir Mediu resigned after the incident, and three ¹⁸ Forecast International report on Albania, February 2008; Presentation of Albanian Defense Minister Fatmir Mediu, at the Atlantic Council of the United States, February 19, 2008.

¹⁹ Presentation of Albanian Defense Minister Fatmir Mediu at the Atlantic Council, February 19, 2008.

²⁰ Jane's Sentinel Security Assessment: The Balkans, November 15, 2007.

²¹ NATO Parliamentary Assembly, The Three Adriatic Aspirants: Capabilities and Preparations, 2007, from the NATO Parliamentary Assembly website, [<http://www.nato-pa.int>].

persons have been charged with negligence. The investigation into the explosion is still ongoing. In September 2008, Kosta Trebica, a key witness in the case, was killed, reportedly in an automobile accident.²²

Some observers have argued the incident may show weaknesses in the professionalism and competence in Albania's government and defense establishment, as well as the lack of an independent judiciary. U.S. Ambassador to Albania John Withers has been critical of apparent efforts by some in Albania's parliament to influence the investigation. Withers has repeatedly stressed that the prosecutor must be allowed to proceed with the case free from political influence.

Regional Issues. Albania has no outstanding territorial issues with its neighbors. Albania was one of the first countries to recognize Kosovo's independence after the former Serbian province declared it on February 17, 2008. This has increased tensions in its relations with Serbia. Albanian leaders have repeatedly said that they do not support merging their country with Kosovo and ethnic Albanian-majority parts of Macedonia in a "Greater Albania." Indeed, U.S. and EU officials often praise Albania for its moderate stance on the Kosovo issue.

Since 2003, Albania has participated with Croatia and Macedonia in the U.S.-sponsored Adriatic Charter, which promotes cooperation among the three countries in defense reforms and other areas in order to boost their NATO membership prospects. Albania participates in other regional fora, including the Southeast Europe Defense Ministerial (SEDM) and the Southeastern Europe Brigade (SEEBRIG).

Albanian officials say that their membership in NATO will stabilize the region by anchoring the alliance more firmly in southeastern Europe. Membership would also give pause to extremist forces in Serbia, they say. Moreover, they contend that it will encourage pro-western forces in Serbia, showing that if they follow the course of the Adriatic Charter countries, their country too can be part of the Euro-Atlantic community.

²² Trebica was also involved in another case, which involved the shipment of poor-quality Chinese ammunition (falsely repackaged as Albanian-produced) to Afghanistan under a U.S. Army contract. The U.S. contractor in the case has been charged with fraud in the United States. Last year, Trebica recorded a conversation with the contractor, in which he complained about high-level corruption in Albania. C.J. Chivers, "Supplier Under Scrutiny on Aging Arms for Afghans," New York Times, March 27, 2008.

Croatia²³

NATO countries evaluated Croatia's request to join the alliance using a number of criteria, such as the state of its political and economic reforms, public support for membership, progress on defense reforms and ability to contribute to allied missions, and whether Croatia plays a positive role in its region. In the final analysis, however, NATO member states made a political judgement on whether Croatia's membership will contribute to their security.

Domestic Reforms. Croatia's progress on political and economic reforms is generally considered to be very good and does not appear to be an obstacle to its NATO candidacy. Croatia has been conducting membership negotiations with the European Union since October 2005. In its November 2007 progress report on Croatia's candidacy, the European Commission found that Croatia has met the political criteria for EU membership. The report praised the progress Croatia has made in reforming its judiciary and fighting corruption. However, it said that Croatia must still make more progress on these issues. Transparency International ranked Croatia 64th out of 179 countries in its 2007 Corruption Perceptions Index. It ranks next-to-last (just above Romania and equal with Bulgaria) when compared to EU and western European countries, but at the top when compared to eastern European and former Soviet countries not part of the EU.²⁴

Croatia has also made progress in minority rights, and to a lesser extent, the return of Serb refugees to their homes. Over 300,000 Serb refugees fled or were driven from their homes during the 1991-1995 war between Croatian and local Serb forces backed by neighboring Serbia. About half that number have returned, according to the Croatian government. Other sources claim that this estimate is inflated as many persons return only briefly in order to sell their property and leave. Many of those who remain are elderly pensioners. The EU stated that further progress is needed on these issues, as well as the prosecution of war criminals. The EU report noted that Croatia is a functioning market economy but stressed the need for further structural reforms, less state interference in the economy, and a better public administration and judicial system.²⁵

Croatia at a Glance

Population: 4.49 million (2007 est.)

Ethnic Composition: 89.6% Croat, 4.5% Serb, 5.9% other (2001)

Total Area: 56,542 sq. km. (slightly smaller than West Virginia)

Gross Domestic Product: $50.96 billion (2007 est.)

Military Budget: $875 million (2007)

Active Duty Armed Forces: 17,660

Sources: 2008 CIA World Factbook; Military Balance 2008; Forecast International

²³ Prepared by Steven Woehrel, Specialist in European Affairs.

²⁴ Transparency International website, [<http://www.transparency.org>].

²⁵ European Commission, Croatia Progress Report 2007, from the Commission website, (continued...)

U.S. officials have echoed these concerns, saying that Croatia needs to continue to assist war refugees, including by restoring their property and tenancy rights, reconstructing their houses, and providing necessary infrastructure. Croatia also needs to pursue judicial reform, including by reducing case backlogs and improving training of judges and court personnel. In addition, the United States wants Croatia to amend laws that discriminate against non-Croatians who had property expropriated during World War II and the communist period.²⁶

Public Support for NATO Membership. Public support has been identified as perhaps the biggest weakness of Croatia's membership candidacy. Public opinion polls from early 2008 showed support for NATO membership barely exceeding 50% of the population, despite active efforts of the Croatian government to boost public awareness of the benefits of NATO membership. After an attack by a Serbian mob on the Croatian embassy in Belgrade following Kosovo's declaration of independence from Serbia in February 2008, this figure increased to over 60%. Those opposing NATO membership believe that it would engage Croatia in international conflicts against its will and that NATO will demand bases in Croatia. Through continuing public relations efforts, the Croatian government has tried to allay these fears and boost public support for NATO membership.

The largest party in the governing coalition, the Croatian Democratic Community (HDZ), strongly supports NATO membership for Croatia. Since the 1999 death of its founder, longtime Croatian strongman Franjo Tudjman, the HDZ has transformed itself from a nationalist, quasi-authoritarian party to a democratically-oriented, pro-European center-right political force. Croatia's leading opposition party, the Social Democratic Party, supports NATO membership, but called for a public referendum on the issue. In any case, Prime Minister Sanader ruled out a referendum on NATO membership during the country's November 2007 parliamentary elections and afterward. The HDZ's coalition partner, the Croatian Peasants' Party-Croatian Social Liberal Party (HSS-HSLS) once supported a NATO referendum, but dropped its demand when it formed a coalition government with the HDZ. An effort by anti-NATO activists to collect enough signatures from Croatian voters to force a referendum failed by a large margin.

Defense Reform and Ability to Contribute to Allied Missions. Croatia has made progress on defense reforms, according to most observers. Croatia is moving from the relatively large, territorially-based conscript army that it had during its war with Serbian forces in the 1990s to a smaller, more professional, more deployable force. Croatia ended conscription at the beginning of 2008. Croatia's active duty armed forces total 17,660 men, of which 12,300 are in the Army.²⁷ By 2010, Croatia plans to have 8% of its land forces deployed in international forces or

²⁵ (...continued)

[http://ec.europa.eu/enlargement/index_en.htm]

²⁶ Testimony of Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 10, 2008, op. cit.

²⁷ International Institute for Strategic Studies, The Military Balance 2007, from the IISS website, [<http://www.iiss.org>].

ready for such deployments. Croatian defense officials say that it is their goal ultimately to have 40% of their forces able to be deployed for international missions. Croatia's 2008 defense expenditures amount to 1.81% of GDP. By 2010, Croatia plans to spend 2% of its GDP on defense, the level recommended by NATO for member states, although currently reached by only 7 of the 26 allies.²⁸

As noted above, NATO has encouraged candidate states to develop "niche" capabilities to assist NATO missions. To this end, Croatia is developing a special operations platoon, a demining platoon, and plans to acquire two helicopters for NATO-led operations. It also plans to contribute a motorized infantry company, a nuclear, chemical and biological weapons defense platoon, and an engineering platoon.²⁹ However, some independent assessments question whether Croatia has committed the financial resources necessary to carry out its planned reforms.³⁰

Croatia has about 190 troops in Mazar-e-Sharif and Faizabadan in northern Afghanistan, as part of the NATO-led ISAF stabilization force, and is planning to increase the size of its force by another 100 troops. Croatia heads an Operational Mentoring and Liaison Team (OMLT) that trains Afghan army units. Croatia says that its forces in Afghanistan operate free of the caveats that limit the deployment and activities of the ISAF contingents of some other countries. It also participates in a military medical team with Albania and Macedonia. Croatia did not support the U.S. invasion of Iraq in 2003 and it has no troops in the U.S.-led coalition there. Croatia will likely continue to need support from its allies to be able to participate in international missions, in part due to a lack of logistical capabilities that limit its capacity to deploy and sustain its forces.

Regional Issues. Croatia has no major conflicts with its neighbors. Relations with Serbia improved greatly after democratic governments came to power in both countries in 2000. Since then, Croatia has also played a largely positive role in Bosnia and Herzegovina, encouraging ethnic Croats there to work within the Bosnian political system rather than seek intervention by Croatia. In mid-March 2008, Croatia resolved an issue over a coastal zone that it had had with two neighbors. Croatia had declared an "ecological and fisheries protection zone" in its Adriatic waters, over the strong objections of neighboring Slovenia and Italy. With the support of the Croatian parliament, Zagreb suspended the zone on March 12, 2008. Croatia and Slovenia had also disagreed over the maritime boundary between the two countries. However, in August 2007, the two countries agreed to refer the dispute for arbitration to the International Court of Justice at The Hague. Another regional issue is Kosovo, which declared independence in February 2008. On March 19, Croatia extended diplomatic recognition to Kosovo.

Since 2003, Croatia has participated with Albania and Macedonia in the U.S.-sponsored Adriatic Charter, which promotes cooperation among the three countries in defense reforms and other areas in order to boost their NATO membership prospects. Croatia participates in other regional fora, including the Southeast Europe Defense Ministerial (SEDM) and the Southeastern Europe Brigade (SEEBRIG).

²⁸ Forecast International report on Croatia, February 2008.

²⁹ NATO Parliamentary Assembly, The Three Adriatic Aspirants: Capabilities and Preparations, 2007, op. cit.

³⁰ Jane's Sentinel Security Assessment: The Balkans, December 14, 2008.

Macedonia³¹

Since joining NATO's Membership Action Plan (MAP) in 1999, Macedonia has worked closely with NATO on a broad array of reforms. Macedonia's efforts have been backed by a strong domestic majority (90% by some polls) favoring membership in NATO. In addition to consultative mechanisms under the MAP process, Macedonia hosts a NATO liaison office in Skopje that provides advice on military reforms and support to NATO-led Balkan operations.³² At a January 2008 meeting to review NATO's progress report on Macedonia's 9th MAP cycle, NATO representatives praised Macedonia's progress in implementing political, economic, and military reforms, but noted that "more needs to be accomplished."³³ Although details of the reports under the MAP process remain classified, media reports, summary analyses, and comments by government officials have indicated a mixed picture for Macedonia but with notable progress achieved in the months and weeks before the Bucharest summit.

Macedonia at a Glance

Population: 2.06 million (2007 est.)

Ethnic Groups:

Macedonian, 64.2%; Albanian, 25.2%; Turkish, 3.9%; Roma, 2.7%; Serb, 1.8%; other, 2.2% (2002 census)

Total Area: 25,333 sq. km. (slightly larger than Vermont)

Gross Domestic Product: $6.85 billion (2007 est.)

Military Budget: $161 million (2007, IISS); $153.4 million (2007, FI)

Active Duty Armed Forces: 10,890 (Army 9,760; Air Force 1,130) (2007)

Sources: CIA World Factbook; IISS Military Balance 2008; Forecast International

Domestic Political Issues. Among the most important factors that has weighed on Macedonia's NATO candidacy prospects has been the state of its political reforms. NATO has identified reform priorities in Macedonia to include "efforts to meet democratic standards, support for reducing corruption and organized crime, judicial reform, improving public administration, and promoting good-neighborly relations."³⁴ Throughout much of 2007, political conflict across the spectrum of political parties in Macedonia caused substantial deadlock in parliament,

³¹ This section was originally prepared by Julie Kim, Specialist in European Affairs, and updated by Steven Woehrel, Specialist in European Affairs.

³² For more information on the NATO headquarters presence in Skopje, see "NATO Headquarters Skopje" web page at [<http://www.jfcnaples.nato.int/nhqs/index.html>].

³³ NATO press release, January 23, 2008.

³⁴ "NATO's relations with the former Yugoslav Republic of Macedonia," from NATO's web page at [http://www.nato.int/issues/nato_fyrom/index.html].

and even led to a physical confrontation in parliament that fall. The net result was stalled progress on passing key reform measures, including bills relating to implementation of the Ohrid Framework Agreement (the 2001 accord that ended a near-civil war in Macedonia). On numerous occasions that year, international officials expressed disappointment with the antagonistic state of political relations across the party spectrum in Macedonia, and the incapacity for political leaders to engage in constructive dialogue and compromise rather than confrontation.³⁵

Shortly before the Bucharest summit, the Macedonian government nearly fell after an ethnic Albanian party briefly left the coalition. Following the summit, a majority in the Assembly voted to dissolve the parliament and hold snap elections on June 1. The election resulted in a crushing victory for Prime Minister Gruevski and his nationalist VRMO-DPMNE party, which won an absolute majority in the parliament and formed a coalition with an ethnic Albanian party, the Democratic Union for Integration. The elections were marred by violence and irregularities in ethnic Albanian-majority areas, and fell short of international standards. The United States has urged Macedonia to follow through on investigations and prosecutions of those responsible for the electoral violence, as well as strengthening safeguards to make sure such incidents are not repeated.³⁶

NATO's political reform priorities identified for Macedonia track closely with the country's EU accession prospects as well. Macedonia has been formally designated as an EU candidate country. In its latest progress reports on EU candidates released in early November 2007, the European Commission praised Macedonia's achievements, but expressed concern that political tensions were delaying important political and legal reforms and undermining the functioning of political institutions.³⁷ Reflecting these concerns, the EU has not yet set a start date for accession talks. This unfulfilled goal remains a priority for Macedonia.

Defense Reform and Capacity to Contribute to Allied Missions.

Macedonia has an extensive track record of implementing broad defense reforms, advancing security cooperation regionally, and contributing to global missions. The Army of the Republic of Macedonia (ARM) has been undergoing a major restructuring effort toward a smaller, lighter, and fully professional force under a streamlined command structure. From a 2007 strength of about 11,000, Macedonia continues to downsize its forces to reach about 8,000 active troops by the end of 2008, to increase the deployability of its forces, and to eliminate conscription. Macedonia's restructuring effort has focused on developing niche capabilities for use in allied operations such as special forces — including special purpose units for counter-insurgency and unconventional operations — and military police. Macedonia has surpassed NATO's informal defense budget benchmark of 2% of GDP. Its 2007

³⁵ See, for example, "NATO Urges More Macedonian Reforms," BalkanInsight, November 16, 2007.

³⁶ Testimony of Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 10, 2008, op. cit.

³⁷ For full text of the 2007 progress reports, see European Commission website, [<http://ec.europa.eu/enlargement>].

defense budget was increased to over $153 million by one estimate, or about 2.3% of GDP, and included a greater share for military modernization than in the past.³⁸

Macedonia has sustained its contributions to numerous international missions, and has taken measures to reduce limitations, or caveats, on the use of its troops. Its current contributions include a 140-strong infantry unit providing security to the NATO ISAF headquarters in Kabul, Afghanistan; about 30 military personnel to the EU force in Bosnia; and a 77-strong special operations unit in Baghdad as part of U.S.-led operations in Iraq. As noted, Macedonia continues to host a NATO headquarters presence in Skopje for the alliance's Balkan operations, mainly in Kosovo. In 2007, it took a leading role in coordinating activities of the U.S.-Adriatic Charter.

Name Dispute. A longstanding unresolved dispute with Greece, a NATO ally, became closely intertwined with Macedonia's prospects for an invitation at the Bucharest summit. The two countries have been in disagreement over Macedonia's use of the name "Macedonia" since 1991, and have met intermittently with U.N. Special Representatives since 1995 in order to reach a mutually acceptable solution to the dispute. U.N. Envoy and U.S. diplomat Matthew Nimetz commenced a new round of talks with Greece and Macedonia in January 2008. With a greater sense of urgency to resolving the dispute, Nimetz floated several new proposals on resolving the dispute in February and March. Further talks with the parties, however, could not produce an agreement.

While this dispute had long been kept on a separate track from Macedonia's Euro-Atlantic aspirations, the two issues became inextricably linked in the run-up to the Bucharest summit. Athens maintained that it could not support Macedonia's NATO candidacy if no mutually acceptable agreement on the name issue was reached. Since NATO operates by consensus, the Greek position made clear that a veto was eminently possible. In contrast, Macedonia's government insisted that it has made numerous concessions already, and that linking its accession prospects to the bilateral name dispute would be unacceptable and would violate an interim accord agreed to by both sides in 1995. In visits to the region and at the March 6, 2008 foreign ministers meeting, NATO representatives urged that a solution be found before the summit.³⁹ After the summit, U.S. and other officials continued to urge both parties to engage in the Nimetz process in order to reach a compromise agreement.

³⁸ Forecast International report on Macedonia, December 2007; Jane's World Armies, January 7, 2008.

³⁹ In December 2007, NATO ministers called for "mutually acceptable, timely solutions to outstanding issues." Visiting Skopje in March 2008, the NATO Secretary General pointedly noted that "Greece is a staunch NATO member," while Macedonia was not. Associated Press, March 3, 2008.

Outcome

Of the three MAP states, NATO invited only Albania and Croatia to begin accession talks to join the alliance after Bucharest. NATO noted with regret that talks to resolve the Macedonia name issue had not produced a successful outcome. Alliance members agreed to extend an invitation to Macedonia “as soon as a mutually acceptable solution to the name issue has been reached” and said they expected talks on the name issue to be “concluded as soon as possible.”⁴⁰ Expressing deep disappointment, the Macedonian delegation left the summit early. At a follow-on meeting in Croatia, President Bush expressed further regret about the failure to include Macedonia and reiterated the U.S. position favoring Macedonia’s entry into NATO.

NATO began membership accession talks with Albania and Croatia in late April. After the negotiations were concluded in early May, both countries submitted letters of intent confirming their desire to join NATO, along with a timetable for completing necessary reforms both before and after accession. The alliance then drew up accession protocols amending the North Atlantic Treaty to permit their membership in NATO. On July 9, 2008, the foreign ministers of Albania and Croatia and the Permanent Representatives of the current 26 NATO allies signed the accession protocols. The protocols must now be ratified, first by current NATO members, then by Albania and Croatia. If all of the countries ratify the protocols, Albania and Croatia will deposit the instruments of accession with the United States, which is the depository for the documents under the terms of the North Atlantic Treaty. Albania and Croatia will then be NATO members.

Enlargement Costs⁴¹

NATO member states contribute to the activities of the alliance in several ways, the chief of which is through the deployment of their own armed forces, funded by their national budgets. Certain commonly conducted activities, however, are paid for out of three NATO-run budgets. These three accounts — the civil budget, the military budget, and the security investment program — are funded by individual contributions from the member states. The countries’ percentage shares of the common funds are negotiated among the members, and are based upon per capita GDP and several other factors.

During the period leading up to first round of enlargement in central and eastern Europe in 1999, analysts estimated the cost of adding new members at between $10 billion and $125 billion, depending upon different threat scenarios and accounting techniques. Some Members of Congress expressed concern over these cost projections and were also worried that the United States might be left to shoulder a large share of the expenditures; they questioned whether existing burdensharing arrangements should continue and suggested that the European allies should be encouraged to assume a larger financial share for the security of the continent. However, a NATO study estimated that enlargement would require only $1.5 billion in common funds expenditures over 10 years, and DOD concurred. It was further forecast that the 2004 round of enlargement would cost a similar amount, “with greater benefits” to U.S. security. In addition, the inclusion of ten new contributors to the NATO common funds actually reduced the percentage shares of the established members — including the United States.⁴²

⁴⁰ Bucharest summit communiqué, April 3, 2008.

⁴¹ Prepared by Carl Ek, Specialist in European Affairs.

In preparation for the Bucharest summit in April 2008, NATO staff prepared estimates of the total cost and the cost-sharing implications of a new round of enlargement. NATO staff have concluded, and allies have informally agreed, that the methodologies and assumptions used to estimate costs and cost sharing arrangements in prior rounds of enlargement were still valid, and that the addition of new members in 2008 would not entail significant costs. The main expenses likely to be charged directly to the alliance’s common military budget would be for air defense upgrades, improvement of in-country facilities, mainly airfields, for deployment, and the procurement of secure communications between NATO headquarters in Brussels and Mons, and capitals of the new member countries. Any other common-funded projects in new member states would be assessed and funded in terms of their contributions to NATO capabilities or support to ongoing missions and are not directly attributable to enlargement. In recent years, the cost issue in general has received relatively little attention from policymakers and the media. The focus has instead been on 1) specialized capabilities that new — and existing — members can bring to the alliance, and 2) member states’ willingness to contribute military assets to alliance operations, particularly in Afghanistan.⁴³

U.S. Policy⁴⁴

The Bush Administration reflects the general NATO view that the door to NATO must remain open to qualified states. Since the Clinton Administration, U.S. officials have supported the idea of a Europe “whole and free.” While NATO remains an organization for the defense of the United States, Canada, and the European allies, it has increasingly developed a political agenda. For example, NATO allies now routinely discuss such matters as energy security, disaster relief, and a range of political issues with Russia. The United States designed the MAP process, and takes a leading role in requiring candidate states to develop a professional military, democratic structures, a transparent defense budget process, ⁴² CRS Report 97-668, NATO Expansion: Cost Issues, by Carl Ek, February 26, 1998. U.S. Department of Defense, Report to the Congress on the Military Requirements and Costs of NATO Enlargement. Washington, D.C. February 1998. U.S. Congressional Budget Office. NATO Burdensharing After Enlargement. Washington, D.C. August 2001. U.S. Department of State. Bureau of European and Eurasian Affairs. Fact Sheet: The Enlargement of NATO. Washington, D.C. January 31, 2003.

⁴³ CRS interview of U.S. Department of Defense official, January 11, 2008.

⁴⁴ Prepared by Paul Belkin, Analyst in European Affairs and Vince Morelli, Section Research Manager, Europe and the Americas Section.

civilian control of the military, and free market structures. The Bush Administration also supports the entry of new European NATO member states into the European Union as a means to build stability.

The Administration supported invitations to Albania, Croatia, and Macedonia at Bucharest. While U.S. officials acknowledged that all three states must continue to improve their militaries and their political institutions, they also believe that each state has made considerable progress over the last several years. These officials also contended that the three governments would contribute to the political stabilization of southeastern Europe.⁴⁵

The Administration has a view of NATO's long-term membership roster that is broader than that of some allies. For instance, the United States strongly supports the entry of countries such as Georgia and Ukraine and continues to argue that Georgia and Ukraine should be invited to join the MAP process. In the days leading to the Bucharest summit, President Bush made a highly visible tour of Georgia and Ukraine, where he touted their qualifications for the MAP. While some allies appear to view Russia's August 2008 invasion of Georgia and ongoing political instability in Ukraine as cause to further oppose granting the MAP to these countries, the Administration continues to advocate for a MAP for Georgia and Ukraine. Administration officials argue that although both countries face significant challenges to meeting the requirements for full NATO membership, they should be granted a clear roadmap to membership as offered by the MAP.⁴⁶

The Bush Administration also supports the idea of a "NATO with global partners." This idea does not necessarily imply membership for countries beyond the Euro-Atlantic region. Instead, the Administration has sought, for example, to engage such countries as Australia, New Zealand, and Japan in the effort to stabilize Afghanistan, but does not actively promote their membership in the alliance.

The allies have extended Partnership for Peace status to a number of central Asian governments, a move that the Administration strongly supports. There are several reasons for this policy, even though these governments are not democratic: the PfP was originally intended as a mechanism to better integrate former Soviet Republics into the west and the United States and its allies wished to encourage greater respect for human rights and nascent democratic practices in central Asia; these governments have since provided logistical support to allied operations in Afghanistan; and several of these countries are key to the development of greater energy security because of their oil and natural gas resources and the pipelines that cross their territory.

⁴⁵ Discussions with Administration officials, January-February 2008. Testimony of Administration officials, Hearing, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 2nd session, 110th Congress, March 11, 2008.

⁴⁶ Testimony of Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 10, 2008, op. cit.

Future Candidates for Future Rounds?

Georgia⁴⁷

After Georgia's "rose revolution" of late 2003 brought a new reformist government to power, Georgia placed top priority on integration with NATO. Georgia began sending troops to assist NATO forces in Kosovo in 1999 and has pledged to send troops to assist the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) in Afghanistan. In 2007, Georgia became the third largest contributor (behind the United States and Britain) to coalition operations in Iraq, with a deployment of 2,000 troops. Georgia joined NATO's Partnership for Peace program in 1994. At the NATO Summit in Prague in November 2002, Georgia declared that it aspired to NATO membership. Although some alliance members initially appeared more confident than others that Georgia had made adequate progress, a consensus was reached in September 2006 to offer Georgia an "Intensified Dialogue" of stepped-up consultations to assist the country in furthering its aspirations for alliance membership.

The alliance has urged Georgia to continue to democratize, develop a market economy with social welfare guarantees, and create a professional military that contributes to Euro-Atlantic security. Other criteria have included the resolution of internal separatist conflicts and international disputes, such as contention with Russia. At a meeting with NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer on February 14, 2008, the head of Georgia's mission to NATO transmitted a note from President Mikheil Saakashvili formally requesting the alliance to invite Georgia to participate in a Membership Action Plan (MAP). On February 14, 2008, the Senate approved S.Res. 439 (sponsored by Senator Lugar), which urged NATO to award a MAP to Georgia and Ukraine as soon as possible.

After a Georgian government crackdown on demonstrators in early November 2007, some allies raised concerns about Georgia's apparently faltering democratization and the suitability of inviting it to participate in a MAP at the NATO summit in Bucharest in April 2008.⁴⁸ De Hoop Scheffer criticized the imposition of emergency rule and the closure of media outlets by the government in Georgia as "not in line with Euro-Atlantic values."⁴⁹ Domestic and international criticism may have helped convince President Saakashvili to admit that his government appeared non-responsive to the concerns of many citizens, and to resign and seek re-election by pledging reforms. Following Saakashvili's re-election in early 2008, NATO "welcomed" the international monitors' assessments that the election reflected the free choice of the voters, and stated that "NATO will continue to deepen its intensified dialogue with Georgia.”⁵⁰ Nonetheless, some allies reportedly urged delaying a decision at the April NATO summit on a MAP for Georgia, at least until after an assessment of that country’s prospective May 2008 legislative election.

⁴⁷ Prepared by Jim Nichol, Specialist in Russian and Eurasian Affairs.

⁴⁸ Financial Times, January 25, 2008, p. 6.

⁴⁹ NATO. Press Release. Statement by the Secretary General on the Situation in Georgia, November 8, 2007.

Georgia has made progress in creating a free market economy, resulting in GDP growth of 12.4% in 2007 and 9.3% during the first quarter of 2008.⁵¹ However, the economy has been hampered somewhat since 2006 by trade restrictions imposed by Russia. Georgia’s high level of lingering poverty was a contributing factor in the civil unrest in late 2007. Although the Georgian government has made some progress in combating corruption, the World Bank stresses that corruption still seriously retards good governance.⁵² Saakashvili has pledged added efforts to combat poverty and corruption. Some estimate that the Russia-Georgia conflict in August 2008 may have reduced Georgia’s GDP growth to 7% for 2008.⁵³

In order to increase interoperability with NATO forces and contribute to NATO operations, the Georgian military has undertaken major efforts to re-equip with western-made or upgraded weapons, armor, aviation, and electronic equipment. Georgia’s Strategic Defense Review suggested that the country eventually might be able to contribute to NATO by developing a niche capability in mountain combat training.⁵⁴ To enhance democratic civil-military relations, a civilian defense minister was appointed in 2004 to head a ministry increasingly staffed by civilians. Some in Georgia have alleged that military budgeting remains non-transparent and thwarts legislative oversight.

Some observers in Georgia and the west have argued that NATO’s failure to offer Georgia a Membership Action Plan at the April 2008 NATO summit emboldened Russia’s aggressiveness toward Georgia and may have been an enabling factor in Russia’s August 2008 invasion of Georgia (discussed in more detail below). Others consider that NATO’s pledge that Georgia eventually would become a member, as well as Georgia’s ongoing movement toward integration with the west, spurred Russian aggression. Saakashvili argued on August 10 that Russia wanted to crush Georgia’s independence and end its bid to join NATO. France and Germany, which had voiced reservations at the April 2008 NATO summit about extending a MAP to Georgia, may argue even more forcefully against admitting Georgia, citing both the higher level of tensions over the separatist regions, Georgia’s military incursion into South Ossetia, and the danger of war with Russia. Although the United States strongly supported a MAP for Georgia at the April 2008 NATO summit, recent events may have dimmed this prospect.

⁵⁰ NATO. Press Release. NATO Spokesman’s Response to the Presidential Elections in Georgia, January 8, 2008. According to a plebiscite held at the same time as the election, about 77% of Georgia’s citizens who voted answered affirmatively that the country should join NATO.

⁵¹ Economist Intelligence Unit, Country Report: Georgia, September 2008.

⁵² The World Bank. Governance Matters 2007: Country Data Reports.

⁵³ Economist Intelligence Unit, Country Report: Georgia, op. cit.

⁵⁴ Georgian Ministry of Defense, Strategic Defense Review, January 2008, p. 83.

NATO has condemned Russia's August 2008 military incursion into Georgia as disproportionate and the subsequent recognition of Abkhazia and South Ossetia's independence as violating Georgia's territorial integrity. The alliance announced on August 19 that it was temporarily suspending meetings of the NATO-Russia Council and that it was forming a NATO-Georgia Council to discuss Georgia's post-conflict democratic, economic, and defense needs.⁵⁵ The Council's inaugural meeting was held in Tbilisi on September 15 as part of a visit by the North Atlantic Council ambassadors and Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer. A communique adopted at the inaugural meeting reaffirmed NATO's commitment to Georgia's sovereignty and territorial integrity, raised concerns about Russia's "disproportionate" military actions against Georgia, and condemned Russia's recognition of the independence of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. The ambassadors stressed that NATO would continue to assist Georgia in carrying out the reform program set forth in Georgia's Individual Partnership Action Plan (IPAP) with NATO. In a separate statement, de Hoop Scheffer called for Russia to permit international observers to enter South Ossetia and Abkhazia and for Russia to draw down troops in the regions to pre-conflict numbers. He reportedly indicated that it might prove difficult to resume meetings of the NATO-Russia Council until such conditions were met.⁵⁶ On September 18-19, a meeting of NATO defense ministers further discussed Georgia's rebuilding needs and the implications of Russia's actions for Euro-Atlantic security. While the defense ministers were meeting, Russian President Medvedev accused NATO of "provoking" the August Russia-Georgia conflict rather than guaranteeing peace.⁵⁷

Ukraine⁵⁸

Ukraine participates in NATO's Partnership for Peace program and has an "Intensified Dialogue" with NATO on possible future membership in NATO and related reforms. On January 15, 2008, President Viktor Yushchenko, Prime Minister Yuliya Tymoshenko, and parliament speaker Arseniy Yatsenyuk sent a letter to NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer requesting a Membership Action Plan (MAP) for Ukraine at the NATO summit in Bucharest. On March 17, President Yushchenko and Prime Minister Tymoshenko sent letters to De Hoop Scheffer, German Federal Chancellor Angela Merkel, and French President Nicolas Sarkozy reiterating Ukraine's request for a MAP.

⁵⁵ NATO. Statement: Meeting of the North Atlantic Council at the level of Foreign Ministers held at NATO Headquarters, Brussels, August 19, 2008.

⁵⁶ NATO. NATO-Georgia Joint Press Statement on the Occasion of the North Atlantic Council Visit to Georgia and the Inaugural Meeting of the NATO-Georgia Commission, September 15, 2008; James Blitz, "NATO Head Attacks EU's Georgia Deal," Financial Times, September 14, 2008.

⁵⁷ Prashant Rao, "NATO Mulls Response as Russia Accuses It over Georgia," Agence France-Presse, September 19, 2008; "Medvedev Accuses NATO of Provoking Georgia War," Agence France-Presse, September 19, 2008.

⁵⁸ Prepared by Steven Woehrel, Specialist in European Affairs.

Supporters of a MAP for Ukraine believe that it is important to give the pro-western government in Kiev a strong signal of support for its Euro-Atlantic aspirations. They say that Ukraine's membership would be a way to incorporate the country more fully into the Euro-Atlantic community of democratic values, as part of the overall U.S. foreign policy goal of creating a Europe "whole and free." Those who view Russia as a potential threat to European security see Ukraine's future membership in NATO as a guarantee against possible Russian attempts to revive its "empire." However, Ukraine's MAP candidacy faces several challenges.

Ukrainian Public Opinion and NATO Membership. One key challenge to Ukraine's desire for a MAP is the current lack of consensus on NATO membership in Ukrainian society. Public opinion polls have shown that less than one-quarter of the population supports NATO membership at present. Ukrainian public opinion, on this as on other issues, is split largely along regional lines. Persons living in southern and eastern Ukraine tend to oppose NATO membership. People in these regions, whether ethnic Russians or Ukrainians, tend to be Russian-speaking, are suspicious of Ukrainian nationalism, and support close ties with Russia.⁵⁹ They are largely opposed to NATO membership because they fear that it will worsen ties with Russia. Many supporters of NATO membership are from western Ukraine, where Ukrainian-speakers dominate, suspicion of Russia is substantial, and support for a western orientation for Ukraine is high. However, western Ukraine is considerably less populous than eastern Ukraine, where most of the country's industrial capacity is concentrated.

In addition to pro-Russian sentiment, many people in these regions and elsewhere retain bad memories of the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, in which Ukrainian draftees were forced to participate. They fear that NATO membership could embroil them in Afghanistan again, and in similar conflicts in distant parts of the world. Ukraine's participation in the U.S.-led coalition in Iraq in 2003-2004 was politically unpopular in Ukraine. President Yushchenko withdrew Ukraine's troops from Iraq shortly after taking office in 2005.

The government coalition, which collapsed in September 2008, supported a MAP for Ukraine. President Yushchenko strongly supports NATO membership for Ukraine. Until the January 2008 letter to NATO Secretary General de Hoop Scheffer, Tymoshenko appeared to be lukewarm at best about joining the alliance. The Party of Regions, the largest opposition party, and the Communist Party are strongly opposed to NATO membership. After the January 2008 letter, they blocked the Ukrainian parliament from conducting business, in protest against Yatsenyuk's signature of the document. The parliament resumed operations on March 6, 2008, after it passed a resolution stating that the parliament would consider legislation to join NATO only after a public referendum approved NATO membership.

Ukrainian leaders acknowledge that an effective public information campaign is needed to boost support in Ukraine for NATO membership. A lack of domestic consensus on NATO membership could make it difficult for future Ukrainian governments to consistently fulfill the terms of a MAP. In February 2008, perhaps in an effort to defuse domestic and Russian criticism over his decision to seek a MAP, President Yushchenko said that Ukraine will not allow the establishment of NATO bases on Ukrainian soil. He noted that the Ukrainian constitution does not permit the establishment of foreign military bases in Ukraine, with the temporary exception of Russia's current Black Sea naval base, the lease for which runs out in 2017.

⁵⁹ Ukraine's population is 77.8% ethnic Ukrainian, and 17.3% ethnic Russian, with a range of other minorities. "Ukraine," CIA World Factbook 2008, Washington, DC.

Lack of Unity Within NATO on a MAP for Ukraine. Before the January 2008 letter by Ukraine's top three leaders, U.S. officials warned that there must be support for the MAP "across the government spectrum," that Ukraine must continue defense reforms, and that Ukraine needs to conduct a serious information campaign to educate the public on NATO. They warned that Ukraine must "have its act together" on these issues and not make "premature appeals" for membership.⁶⁰ The January 2008 letter to the NATO Secretary General appeared to remove this objection for the United States. During a visit to Kiev on April 1 to meet with President Yushchenko, President Bush strongly supported granting a MAP to Ukraine at the Bucharest summit.

Key European NATO allies were reluctant to consider a MAP for Ukraine at Bucharest in part because they feel that Ukraine's qualifications for a MAP are weak, and in part because they are concerned about damaging relations with Russia. On March 6, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said, "I cannot hide my skepticism" about Ukraine's chances for a MAP. At the NATO foreign ministers' meeting, French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner and other European leaders stressed the need for maintaining good relations with Moscow.⁶¹

Outcomes, Prospects, and Russia's Reaction⁶²

The allies declined to offer Georgia and Ukraine a MAP at the Bucharest summit. However, in the Summit Communique, the allies praised Georgia's and Ukraine's "valuable contributions to Alliance operations,"⁶³ and declared that "we support these countries' applications for MAP." In unprecedented language, the alliance pledged that Georgia and Ukraine would eventually become members of NATO without specifying when that might happen. The allies also said that the question of MAPs for Kiev and Tbilisi could be revisited at the NATO Foreign Ministers' meeting in December 2008.

⁶⁰ Transcript of remarks by David J. Kramer, Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for European and Eurasian Affairs, December 7, 2007, from the State Department website [<http://www.state.gov>].

⁶¹ Lorne Cook, "NATO Considers Balkan Membership, as Greeks Threaten Veto," Agence France-Presse wire service, March 6, 2008.

⁶² Prepared by Jim Nichol, Specialist in Russian and Eurasian Affairs, and Steven Woehrel, Specialist in European Affairs.

⁶³ Georgia stressed at the summit that it would contribute troops to peacekeeping operations in Afghanistan.

Among the arguments used at the summit by allies opposed to a MAP for Georgia, German Defense Minister Franz Josef Jung argued on April 2 that Georgia does not meet a requirement of NATO membership (and of MAP) to be a contributor to rather than a recipient of alliance security, since a U.N. observer mission was stationed in Abkhazia, to which Germany and other NATO countries contribute personnel. Similarly, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier raised concerns on April 2 that political instability in Georgia makes it unsuitable for a MAP. He also argued that European relations with Russia were under “strain,” because of policies that included the recognition by many European governments of Kosovo’s independence, and that Russia could become “unmanageable” if further strains occurred. French Prime Minister Francois Fillon stated on April 1 that Paris first wanted to join in a European “dialogue” with Russia on the balance of power before considering a MAP for Georgia.⁶⁴ Some observers suggested that European concerns about upsetting energy ties with Russia affected views toward a MAP for Georgia.

Some allies also expressed concerns about the democratization progress in Georgia. The Summit Declaration called for Georgia’s prospective May 2008 legislative elections to be “free and fair.” The Communique also called for Russia to address Georgia’s remaining concerns about the closure of Russian military bases on its territory, presumably referring to the fact that Russia continues to use bases in Abkhazia, and in South Ossetia for its “peacekeepers,” in line with Russia’s commitments under the adapted Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE) Treaty.

Despite disappointment in Tbilisi, Georgia President Saakashvili hailed the Summit Communique language that Georgia “will become a member of NATO” and claimed that it was a “direct obligation” by the alliance that was better than a MAP, which does not guarantee NATO membership.

The ambiguous result of the summit caused varying reactions within Ukraine. President Yushchenko and the Ukrainian government hailed the summit as a key stepping-stone on Kiev’s path toward NATO membership, pointing in particular to the commitment made to admit Ukraine into the alliance. In contrast, Yanukovych and the opposition applauded the denial of a MAP at the summit, viewing it as a blow to Yushchenko’s pro-NATO policy.

As discussed in more detail below, the conflict between Russia and Georgia in August 2008 may have an important impact on Ukraine’s chances for receiving a MAP. European NATO countries that have opposed a MAP for Ukraine may be even more reluctant to agree to one, fearing a sharp deterioration in relations with Moscow and perhaps even being embroiled in a military conflict with Russia. On the other hand, supporters of a MAP for Ukraine have argued that the refusal to grant a MAP to Kiev and Tbilisi may have emboldened Moscow to use massive military force against Georgia. They believe that a MAP for Ukraine and Georgia would send a strong warning signal to Russia to not repeat the use of such aggressive tactics. It would also signal NATO's rejection of Moscow's assertion of a sphere of influence in post-Soviet countries.

⁶⁴ Open Source Center. Europe: Daily Report (hereafter EDR), April 2, 2008, Doc. No. EUP-72004; April 2, 2008, Doc. No. EUP-72002; Reuters, April 1, 2008.

Another issue that may have an impact on Ukraine's MAP prospects is the instability of Ukraine's government. On September 16, 2008, Ukraine's pro-western government collapsed. The Our Ukraine bloc of President Viktor Yushchenko quit the governing coalition due to laws passed by parliament restricting President Yushchenko's power. In addition, Yushchenko, who has sharply condemned the Russian assault on Georgia, has been angered by Tymoshenko's reluctance to comment on the issue or support his plans to place restrictions on Russia's use of its Black Sea Fleet ships based in Ukraine.

Analysts believe that Prime Minister Yuliya Tymoshenko could form a coalition government with the opposition Party of Regions, led by Viktor Yanukovich. Yanukovich has strongly backed Russian actions in Georgia. A Tymoshenko-Party of Regions government could conceivably downplay or even withdraw its support for a MAP. If no new government is formed within 30 days, the crisis could lead to new parliamentary elections (the third in less than three years), which critics of a MAP for Ukraine may claim as evidence of the instability and irresponsibility of the country's leadership.

Russia's Reaction. Russian leaders appeared dissatisfied with the Bucharest summit outcome, despite the fact that neither Georgia nor Ukraine were offered a MAP. Then-President Putin reacted harshly to NATO's pledge of eventual membership for Georgia and Ukraine. On April 16, 2008, he directed his government to establish a broad range of cooperative ties with Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Both Georgia and NATO protested these Russian moves as undermining Georgia's sovereignty and territorial integrity. Georgian Foreign Minister Davit Bakradze warned that Russia would "do everything" over the subsequent months to destabilize Georgia in the expectation that the foreign ministers would then balk at a MAP for Georgia.⁶⁵

Tensions increased between Russia and Georgia in the months following the Bucharest summit when some unmanned aerial vehicles used by Georgia for reconnaissance were shot down over Abkhazia, Russia boosted the number of "peacekeepers" in Abkhazia to 3,000, and on several occasions South Ossetian and Georgian forces exchanged gunfire that resulted in casualties. After such exchanges intensified in early August 2008, Georgia reported that it was forced to move its troops into South Ossetia to quell the gunfire. Whether by design or in response, Russian military forces swept into South Ossetia and Abkhazia and then into large swaths of surrounding Georgian territory. Soon after a ceasefire was mediated by the EU on August 14-15, Russia recognized the independence of Abkhazia and South Ossetia. Russia also announced that it was suspending most cooperation with NATO, although Russia's emissary to NATO stated on September 3 that Russia would continue to cooperate with NATO on trans-shipment of supplies to Afghanistan.⁶⁶

⁶⁵ Open Source Center. Central Eurasia: Daily Report (hereafter CEDR), April 3, 2008, Doc. Nos. CEP-950352 and CEP-950455; April 4, 2008, Doc. No. CEP-950366; April 5, 2008, Doc. No. CEP-950176; and April 6, Doc. No. CEP-950074.

Russian leaders have also been hostile to Ukraine's possible NATO membership. Russia has viewed the former Soviet republic as lying within its sphere of influence, in which western countries and institutions should play little role. NATO, as a military alliance, is viewed with particular suspicion. On February 14, 2008, in response to a question about possible Ukrainian membership in NATO, then-President Putin warned that Russia might be forced to take military countermeasures, including aiming missiles against Ukraine, if Kiev hosted foreign bases or joined the U.S. missile defense project.⁶⁷ According to Russian press accounts, Putin reportedly told President Bush and NATO leaders at the NATO-Russia summit that Ukraine was not a real state, given its regional heterogeneity, and that Ukraine would cease to exist if it joined NATO. On April 8, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Russia would do all that it could do to prevent NATO membership for Ukraine. On April 11, Chief of the Russian General Staff General Yuriy Baluyevsky warned that Russia would take military and "other measures" if Ukraine joined NATO.⁶⁸

In addition to changes in its military posture, Russia could react in several other ways to the prospect of NATO membership for Ukraine, judging by Moscow's past conduct in the region, particularly its conflict with Georgia. It could try to stir up regional conflicts between eastern and western Ukraine. Russia could encourage pro-Russian groups to intensify anti-NATO campaigns and stir up conflict by pushing for use of Russian as an official language in eastern and southern Ukraine. Russia could even encourage those favoring more autonomy for these regions or even their separation from Ukraine, particularly in the case of the Crimean peninsula. It should be noted, however, that such tactics have not always worked as Moscow expected. Indeed, they have sometimes produced a backlash among the large majority of Ukrainians who favor the country's sovereignty and territorial integrity.

Russia could also exploit close economic ties between the two countries. As it did in January 2006, Russia could cut off natural gas supplies to Ukraine, or sharply increase the price it charges. Russia could also cut off or hinder other trade with Ukraine, or make life difficult for the many Ukrainian labor migrants in Russia. Russia has used similar tactics in disputes with Moldova and Georgia, both of which have sought closer ties with the EU or NATO or both. In any case, Russian ability and desire to "punish" Ukraine politically and economically could exceed the ability and willingness of many NATO states to respond.

⁶⁶ "Envoy Says Russia to Continue Cooperation with NATO on Afghanistan," BBC Monitoring International Reports, September 3, 2008.

⁶⁷ Transcript of press conference with President Putin and President Yushchenko, February 14, 2008, from the Johnson's List website, [<http://www.cdi.org/russia/johnson/2008-32-40.cfm>]

⁶⁸ Jamestown Foundation Eurasia Daily Monitor, April 14, 2008, Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty Daily Report, April 9, 2008, and Agence France-Presse wire dispatch, April 11, 2008.

Another possibility is that, after complaining loudly, Russia would grudgingly accept NATO membership for Ukraine, as it did in the case of the Baltic states, Poland, and other countries in central Europe. Many observers believe that this outcome may be less likely due to the particular sensitivity of Ukraine to Russians, many of whom believe the country should be closely tied to Russia, as much of it has been from the 17th century until 1991. In addition, many observers note that Russia's foreign policy has been more assertive in recent years, as high revenues from energy exports have improved its internal and external finances. Moreover, the Russian government has used anti-NATO and anti-U.S. rhetoric to shore up its domestic support.

In his September 10, 2008, testimony on the accession of Albania and Croatia before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Secretary Fried stated that "NATO has unfinished business in Georgia and Ukraine... Neither nation is ready for NATO membership now. The question is whether these countries should have the same prospects to meet NATO's terms for membership as other European nations. This is why the United States supports approving both countries entry into NATO's Membership Action Plan."⁶⁹ In his statement, Secretary Fried also noted that "we seek good relations with Russia. We take into account Russia's security concerns. But we also take account of the concerns and aspirations of people who live in the countries around Russia. Free people have the right to choose their own path."⁷⁰

Other Countries

In addition to Georgia and Ukraine, other countries that currently participate in the Partnership for Peace program could seek full membership in NATO in the future. In the western Balkan region, these include Serbia, Montenegro, and Bosnia-Herzegovina. At the Bucharest summit, the alliance invited Montenegro and Bosnia-Herzegovina to begin an Intensified Dialogue with NATO, an interim step relating to membership aspirations. Both countries also agreed to develop concrete relations with the alliance through Individual Partnership Action Plans (IPAP). At Bucharest, NATO offered to consider an Intensified Dialogue with Serbia, should Belgrade request one. However, a lack of political consensus in Serbia over possible NATO membership may delay Serbia's progress. Kosovo is also likely to seek closer ties with NATO, perhaps at first through PfP.

Several allied governments believe that the overall pace of NATO enlargement is too compressed, and wish to consider first how to resolve a complex range of issues. In their view, if Albania and Croatia succeed in joining the alliance, then the next round should go more slowly. These governments tended to oppose placing Georgia and Ukraine in the MAP at Bucharest, and contend that other issues — the calming of nationalist emotions in Serbia, an overall improvement in NATO-Russian ⁶⁹ Testimony of Daniel Fried before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 10, 2008, op. cit.

⁷⁰ Ibid.

relations, and coming to grips with the wide-ranging problems in energy security — must first be resolved before considering new countries for the MAP.⁷¹

Policy Considerations⁷²

As in previous rounds of enlargement, a range of political factors attends consideration of the candidate states' application for membership. Beyond the qualifications achieved by a candidate state in the MAP process, such matters as the stabilization of southeastern Europe, Russia's voice in European security, and bilateral relations between a member state and a candidate state also come into play.

Stability in southeastern Europe is an issue of great importance both to NATO and the European Union, and current member governments believe that enlargement can serve this goal. NATO's decision to go to war against Serbia in 1999 to stop ethnic cleansing in Kosovo, and the alliance's subsequent creation of its Kosovo Force (KFOR) to contribute to Kosovo's stability are evidence of this point. Further evidence is the EU's decision to lead Kosovo's "supervised independence."⁷³ Both Serbia and Russia reacted strongly against Kosovo's independence, declared on February 17, 2008. The United States and most EU governments recognized Kosovo's independence the following week. On February 21 the U.S. embassy in Belgrade was attacked, as was the Croatian embassy, and part of the Slovenian embassy was sacked and burned. Serbian police reportedly stood by while mobs carried out these attacks.

Serbian government leaders have vowed never to accept Kosovo's independence, and some may be complicit in stirring up unrest among the Serbian minority in northern Kosovo. Nonetheless, despite strong disagreement with EU and NATO member states over Kosovo, Serbia seeks integration into Europe through EU membership and supports building closer relations with NATO through the Partnership for Peace program. However, as indicated earlier, public opposition within Serbia to full NATO membership means political support for an intensified dialogue with NATO may be lacking.

Albania and Croatia have recognized Kosovo's new status. Croatia has sought to serve as a channel for the United States and Europe with Serbia, and has resettled half of the 300,000 Serb refugees who fled Croatia during the Balkan conflicts of the 1990s. According to a range of European governments, there is minimal discrimination in Croatia against the Serbian minority. The ability of the Albania, Croatia, and Macedonia to put to rest enmity towards Serbia resulting from the conflicts of the 1990s is an argument in favor of their serving as a factor for stabilization in southeastern Europe, in the view of some member states. Their entry into NATO could also serve as a positive example for future NATO candidates, including Serbia.⁷⁴

⁷¹ Interviews with European officials, January-February 2008.

⁷² This and the following section prepared by Paul Belkin, Analyst in European Affairs, and Vince Morelli, Section Research Manager, Europe and the Americas Section.

⁷³ CRS Report RL31053, Kosovo and U.S. Policy: Background and Current Issues, by Julie Kim and Steven Woehrel; and CRS Report RS21721, Kosovo's Independence and U.S. Policy, by Steven Woehrel.

As discussed earlier, Russia's opposition to the candidacies of Ukraine and Georgia for the MAP has been shrill and threatening. Prime Minister Putin has said that Russia will target nuclear weapons on Ukraine should it ever become a member of NATO.⁷⁵ Russia has reduced natural gas supplies to Ukraine and Georgia several times in the last several years, ostensibly because the two countries would not agree to pay a market price, but also as a likely act of intimidation. More broadly, Gazprom, Russia's government-owned national energy company that was once led by the President Dmitri Medvedev, has been attempting to purchase distribution networks in Europe. NATO discussed energy security at the Bucharest summit, and some European governments believe that the alliance must first come to grips with how to respond to energy cut-offs before moving closer to states such as Georgia and Ukraine that are vulnerable to Moscow's energy politics.⁷⁶ Russia's August 2008 invasion of Georgian territory and subsequent recognition of Abkhazia and South Ossetia have heightened calls among alliance members to slow NATO enlargement in favor of focusing on improving NATO-Russia relations. Proponents of this view tend to argue that while desirable, NATO enlargement should not come at the cost of jeopardizing Russian cooperation with alliance members on priority issues such as the Iranian nuclear program and trade and energy issues. Critics and Administration officials respond that the alliance must continue to seek constructive relations with Russia, but that Russia should not be granted what would amount to a de facto veto over decisions regarding alliance enlargement.⁷⁷

Russia has also posed other obstacles to improved relations with NATO. Estonian officials contend that cyber attacks on computers in Estonian banks and governmental offices in spring 2007 originated from within the Russian government.⁷⁸ Georgian officials also allege that cyber attacks on Georgian government websites during the August 2008 conflict originated in Russia. Moscow opposes the Bush Administration's ideas for a missile defense system in Europe, and has reportedly spurned a range of proposals to include Russia in the system.⁷⁹ Some European governments argue that NATO and the EU must maintain a fully open

⁷⁴ Interviews with European officials, February 2008.

⁷⁵ "Putin Threatens Ukraine on NATO," Washington Post, February 13, 2008.

⁷⁶ CRS Report RS22409, NATO and Energy Security, by Paul Gallis.

⁷⁷ See, for example, Dan Bilefsky and Stephen Castle, "NATO Can't Be Cowed by Kremlin, U.S. Says," International Herald Tribune, September 15, 2008; Robert Farley, "But What Does it Mean for NATO?" American Prospect online, August 15, 2008. Available at [<http://www.prospect.org>]; and John Vincour, "Relying on Russia: A Question of Risks," International Herald Tribune, September 22, 2008.

⁷⁸ "An Assertive Russia Sends Chill Through Baltics," International Herald Tribune, November 12, 2007.

⁷⁹ Interviews with Bush Administration officials, May 2007-January 2008; see also CRS Report RL34051, Long-Range Ballistic Missile Defense in Europe, by Carl Ek and Steven A. Hildreth.

communication with Moscow and continue to seek to find a measure of accommodation under these circumstances. Again, at the same time, the allies assert that Russia must not be allowed effectively to veto further NATO enlargement, or any NATO policies.

The August 2008 conflict between Russia and Georgia has also led to renewed discussion within NATO over the alliance's collective defense clause, enshrined in Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty. Article 5, considered by most to be the defining feature of the alliance, obligates allies to defend against an armed attack on NATO soil. Observers disagree as to whether Russia would have invaded Georgian territory had Georgia been a NATO member, and as to how NATO would have responded in the case of such an event. However, the conflict has provoked more serious consideration both of the possibility of armed conflict between NATO and Russia and of NATO's willingness to respond in the event of a similar attack on a NATO ally. The Baltic states and Poland have voiced particular concern regarding the credibility of Article 5 as a guarantor of collective defense. Debate over Article 5 stands to intensify as NATO considers further enlargement within areas considered by Russia as falling within its traditional sphere of influence and as Russia seeks to exert influence in these areas.

Conclusion

Most allies seem to believe that although Albania's and Croatia's militaries and resources are modest, both countries' road to membership in the alliance could lead to greater stability in southeastern Europe, especially given the independence of Kosovo and the enduring hostility to NATO of important political factions in Serbia. Additionally, the United States and several other leading governments in the alliance expect new member states to develop niche capabilities to contribute to NATO operations around the world. More broadly, U.S. officials continue to view NATO as the primary institutional mechanism to ensure transatlantic security. They argue that although NATO's primary purpose is the defense of its members, the alliance has become a force for peace throughout Europe.⁸⁰

NATO is facing current and future challenges that may shape any following rounds of enlargement. An ongoing strategic concern of the alliance is the stabilization of Afghanistan, which has become the alliance's most important mission. In addition, NATO faces other issues such as global terrorism, cyber-attacks, and strategically, two of the most important, energy security and relations with Russia. Gazprom, Russia's national energy company, has been making strong efforts to control parts of Europe's oil and natural gas distribution network. Even without such control, much of Europe and the Caucasus depend upon Russia for portions of their energy supply. Gazprom's repeated supply disruptions to customer countries underscore a stark reality: Russia can cut off a vital lifeline if it so desires. Countermeasures — new pipelines skirting Russia and drawing supplies from a range of sources, and conservation — will require years of planning and implementation, probably at great expense. Some allies believe that energy security must be enhanced before new members in succeeding rounds may be extended invitations to join, particularly if they are vulnerable to Russian pressure. Concurrent efforts to improve relations with Russia are likely to be a centerpiece of European allies' policy during this period.

⁸⁰ See testimony of Daniel Fried, September 10, 2008, op. cit.

Appendix. Legislation on Enlargement in the 109th and 110th Congresses⁸¹

The Senate has assented to all five rounds of NATO enlargement. Congress has played a particularly active role in shaping the alliance's eastward expansion since the end of the Cold War. In the NATO Participation Act of 1994 (title II of P.L. 103-447), Congress for the first time authorized the president both to assist designated former Soviet Bloc countries to become full NATO members and to provide excess defense articles, international military education and training, and foreign military financing assistance to these countries. In subsequent legislation in 1996, 1998, and 2002, Congress further encouraged and endorsed NATO's eastward enlargement, while outlining the conditions under which such enlargement should take place.⁸²

Before ratifying the treaty protocols enabling the alliance's 1998 and 2004 enlargements, the Senate broke with past practice, subjecting its approval of the protocols to several conditions. One such condition, as articulated in the Senate's resolutions of ratification for both enlargements, requires the president to submit to the appropriate congressional committees a detailed report on each country being actively considered for NATO membership before beginning accession talks and to submit updated reports on each country before signing any protocols of accession. Specifically, these reports are to include an evaluation of how a country being actively considered for NATO membership will further the principles of NATO and contribute to the security of the North Atlantic area; an evaluation of the country's eligibility for membership, including military readiness; an explanation of how an invitation to the country would affect the national security interests of the United States; a U.S. government analysis of common-funded military requirements and costs associated with integrating the country into NATO and an analysis of the shares of those costs to be borne by NATO members; and a preliminary analysis of the budgetary implications for the United States of integrating that country into NATO.⁸³

⁸¹ Prepared by Paul Belkin, Analyst in European Affairs.

⁸² See the NATO Enlargement Facilitation Act of 1996 (title VI of section 101(c) of title I of division A of P.L. 104-208), the European Security Act of 1998 (title XXVII of division G of P.L. 105-277), and the Gerald B.H. Solomon Freedom Consolidation Act of 2002 (P.L. 107-187). For more information, see CRS Report RL30192, NATO: Congress Addresses Expansion of the Alliance, by Paul Gallis; Senate Executive Report 108-6, submitted by the Committee on Foreign Relations to accompany Treaty Doc. 108-04 Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on Accession of Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia, and Slovenia, April 30, 2003; and CRS Report RS21055, NATO Enlargement, by Paul Gallis.

⁸³ See Resolution of Ratification of Treaty Document 105-36, Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on Accession of Poland, Hungary, and Czech Republic, as agreed to in the Senate on April 30, 1998; and Resolution of Ratification of Treaty Document 108-4, Protocols to the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949 on Accession of Bulgaria, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Romania, Slovakia, and Slovenia, as agreed to in the Senate on May 8, 2003. For a detailed discussion of the Senate's role in NATO enlargement see CRS Report RL31915, NATO Enlargement: Senate Advice and Consent, by Michael John Garcia.

Members of the 109th and 110th Congresses have expressed continued support for NATO enlargement. On September 29, 2006, toward the end of the 109th Congress, Senator Richard Lugar introduced S. 4014, the Freedom Consolidation Act of 2006. The bill, expressing support for NATO enlargement and designating Albania, Croatia, Georgia, and Macedonia as eligible to receive assistance under the NATO Participation Act of 2004, passed the Senate on November 16, 2006. S. 4014 was referred to the House International Relations Committee but was not taken up before the end of the 109th Congress.

In the 110th Congress, both chambers passed successor bills to the bill that passed the Senate in the 109th Congress. The NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007, introduced by Senator Lugar on February 6, 2007, passed the Senate by unanimous consent on March 15, 2007. A companion bill, H.R. 987, introduced by Representative John Tanner in the House on February 12, 2007, passed the House on March 6. President Bush signed it into law (P.L. 110-17) April 9, 2007. The NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007 reaffirms the United States' "commitment to further enlargement of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization to include European democracies that are able and willing to meet the responsibilities of membership..."⁸⁴ The act calls for the "timely admission" of Albania, Croatia, Georgia, the "Republic of Macedonia (FYROM)," and Ukraine to NATO, recognizes progress made by Albania, Croatia, and Macedonia on their Membership Action Plans (MAPs), and applauds political and military advances made by Georgia and Ukraine while signaling regret that the alliance has not entered into a MAP with either country. Congress also affirms that admission of these five countries into NATO should be "contingent upon their continued implementation of democratic, defense, and economic reform, and their willingness and ability to meet the responsibilities of membership in [NATO] and a clear expression of national intent to do so."⁸⁵

In addition to expressing support for the candidacies and potential candidacies of Albania, Croatia, Georgia, Macedonia, and Ukraine, the NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007 authorizes FY2008 appropriations for security assistance to each of these countries. This assistance shall be consistent with the conditions set by the NATO Participation Act of 1994, which limit the types of security assistance offered by the United States to prospective NATO member states to the transfer of excess defense articles (as determined under section 516 and 519 of the Foreign Assistance Act), international military education and training (as determined under chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act), and foreign military financing assistance (as determined under section 23 of the Arms Export Control Act). According to the NATO Participation Act, security assistance should encourage joint planning, training, and military exercises with NATO forces, greater interoperability, and conformity of military doctrine.⁸⁶

⁸⁴ NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007 (P.L. 110-17), 3(2). See also Senate Foreign Relations Committee, S.Rept. 110-34 on the NATO Freedom and Consolidation Act of 2007. March 9, 2007.

⁸⁵ Ibid. Sec 2(22).

⁸⁶ NATO Participation Act of 1994, Sec. 203.

Both the Senate and House have expressed further support for a strengthening of Allied relations with Georgia and Ukraine, passing companion resolutions expressing strong support “for [NATO] to enter into a Membership Action Plan with Georgia and Ukraine.”⁸⁷ The resolutions draw attention to contributions made by Georgia and Ukraine to the collective security of the alliance, and highlight progress made in each country towards a stronger relationship with NATO. In what could be an effort to address some European allies’ concern that a MAP would be understood as a guarantee of future NATO membership, the resolutions explicitly state that a MAP does not ensure membership. On September 9, 2008, in response to the August conflict between Russia and Georgia, Representative John Shimkus (IL) introduced H.Con.Res. 409, expressing the support of the Congress for awarding a membership action plan (MAP) to Georgia and Ukraine at the NATO Foreign Ministers meeting in December 2008. Although the U.S. government continues to express its support for such a decision, some European allies have reinforced their position that now would not be an appropriate time to extend such an invitation. They cite the uncertainty over the Georgian political situation as well as the recent collapse of the government coalition in Ukraine.

As discussed earlier in the report, congressional deliberation over post-Cold War NATO enlargement has revolved largely around three issues: cost; burdensharing; and relations with Russia. In terms of cost, the Congressional Budget Office (CBO) estimates that additional costs to the United States associated with NATO expansion to the five countries designated in the NATO Freedom Consolidation Act would not exceed $30 million over the 2008-2012 period. Based on the State Department’s 2008 appropriation request, CBO estimates that outlays would total $12 million of 2008, and $30 million over the period from 2008-2012.⁸⁸

Neither the NATO Freedom Consolidation Act nor the accompanying Senate Foreign Relations Committee Report directly addresses potential concerns regarding burdensharing within the alliance or the effect a further round of enlargement might have on relations with Russia. However, Members of the 110th Congress have expressed such concerns in several congressional hearings, and Members on the United States congressional delegation to the NATO Parliamentary Assembly are said to have discussed these issues with their European counterparts, as well as with officials in Albania, Croatia, and Macedonia.⁸⁹

⁸⁷ S.Res. 439, introduced by Senator Lugar, passed the Senate on February 14, 2008. H.Res. 997, introduced by Representative Robert Wexler, passed the House on April 1, 2008.

⁸⁸ Congressional Budget Office Cost Estimate, S. 494 NATO Freedom Consolidation Act of 2007, March 9, 2007. Included in S.Rept. 110-34, op. cit.

⁸⁹ Members of Congress expressed some concerns as to an expanded alliance and the effect of enlargement on NATO and U.S. relations with Russia during a July 2007 House Committee on Foreign Affairs hearing on central and eastern Europe, a March 4, 2008 Helsinki Commission hearing on NATO enlargement, and March 11 and September 10, 2008 Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings on NATO enlargement.

Figure 1. Europe

